

General Model of Child Development

Researchers have developed many complex models to describe the factors that affect children's development. However, what it boils down to is simply the general model shown below: children have needs, those needs can be met with varied resources, and the extent to which those needs are met affect the outcomes children attain. This is illustrated in the General Model of Child Development.

